COVID-19 pandemic reveals how critical child care is to workers

When the COVID-19 pandemic arrived, some child care businesses became temporarily inactive in response to the drop in demand for care, and some programs had to reduce the number of children served due to safety requirements.

Child care providers that remained open needed to change some practices to maintain safe environments for children during the pandemic. Providers have stated, the cost to implement these practices is high, and the most significant cost to day care centers is implementing and maintaining the smaller child-to-staff ratios necessary to limit potential virus exposure for children and staff members.

As a result, fewer child care options were available and essential workers found it difficult to locate child care. Child care programs found it difficult to meet the costs of operating their child care business.

At the same time, state and local governments identified child care as a key service for frontline workers with young children. In response, Federal and State government began efforts to keep a sufficient number of child care businesses operating.

The Coronavirus Aid, Relief, and Economic Security (CARES) Act brought thousands of dollars for essential workers to pay for the cost of child care. Supplies, such as hand sanitizer, masks, wipes, gloves and other items were distributed to child care providers through the CCR&Rs in New York. Funding through loans and grants were also available to child care programs for operational expenses to help sustain child care businesses. The CCR&R staff informed and assisted programs to obtain these available resources.
